State of Infrastructure and Reconciliation Negotiations

Negotiations on the Build Back Better reconciliation package have continued to stall with both the Senate and House of Representatives in recess this week and with the looming government funding deadline on February 18. It is likely that all attention will be turned to funding the government when Congress returns next week in order to come to a deal and prevent a government shutdown. It is still unclear whether another continuing resolution will be needed to get a government funding package across the finish line.

On Thursday, Rep. Pramila Jayapal (D-WA), chair of the Congressional Progressive Caucus, called on the Senate to pass a slimmed down version of the Build Back Better package before President Biden's March 1 State of the Union Address. She argued that this package could include significant parts of the original reconciliation package that seem to have consensus across all wings of the Democratic Party. This includes the climate provisions, drug pricing reform, and lowering other related health care costs.

Liam Donovan's Bottom Line

Bottom Line: Build Back Breyer. Any discernible movement with regard to Democrats' stalled reconciliation package remained rhetorical this week, as members reacted to remarks from the President's year-one press conference. The pivot to pragmatism continued to sweep even the most strident lawmakers, with Rep. Pramila Jayapal (D-WA), chair of the Congressional Progressive Caucus, telling a group of climate activists "Let's take those things [that Joe Manchin supports] and put them together and pass them in the Senate," calling the provisions "truly transformational" in their own right. Elsewhere, the congressional reaction to Biden's comments indicates that the bargaining phase remains ongoing, with Senate supporters of the expanded child tax credit (CTC) writing a letter to the White House urging them not to give up on the lapsed monthly payment program enacted in the 2021 American Rescue Plan. Biden had indicated last week when asked by reporters that he is “not sure” if CTC will be included in the face of opposition from Sen. Joe Manchin (D-WV). For his part, Manchin told a local radio host on Thursday that he was open to a means-tested CTC, but that he wanted it targeted to those making $75,000 or less. House Majority Whip Jim Clyburn (D-SC) sounded support for this approach in an interview later that day, a noteworthy signal from a key House leader.

But the most notable development in Washington in recent days had nothing to do with legislation, even as it stands to have a significant downstream impact on the timeline, bandwidth, and political circumstances surrounding efforts to pass the Biden agenda. Justice Stephen Breyer on Thursday announced his intention to retire from the Supreme Court upon confirmation of a successor, opening the door for President Biden to nominate his replacement, and reorienting the near-term priorities of an administration that had been stuck in neutral. The deliberation and selection of a high court pick by the White House and the advice, consent, and ultimate consideration of a candidate by the Senate is sure to suck up the bulk of the oxygen in the coming weeks and months, shifting the Beltway conversation from legislative futility to the President’s opportunity to leave a legacy-defining mark on the bench. In addition to a welcome respite for a reeling President and party leadership, the exercise offers a chance to rebuild goodwill after an extended period of intramural tension, an intangible but nonetheless important element of efforts to reboot BBB.

With the need to negotiate and pass a long-term government funding bill already expected to dominate the month of February, the intrusion of a SCOTUS vacancy is likely to set back the timetable for resuming the reconciliation push even further into Q2. Given the historic nature of the pick, there is less riding on a breakthrough by the March 1 State of the Union Address, which suddenly has a new centerpiece. And with the House gearing up to consider the America COMPETES Act, its answer with the Senate-passed USICA China competitiveness bill, the coming weeks will have no shortage of storylines and spade work even in the absence of BBB news.
