State of Infrastructure and Reconciliation Negotiations

A flurry of meetings among top Democratic lawmakers has helped breathe life into a potential revival of the stalled reconciliation package formerly known as Build Back Better. Senator Joe Manchin (D-WV), the crucial holdout in negotiations, has been meeting with Majority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-NY), while President Biden met with both the Senate Majority Leader and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-CA). While these talks have not resulted in firm compromises, there is growing optimism that Senator Manchin may support a legislative package primarily geared around deficit reduction measures and prescription drug pricing. However, rumors that Senator Manchin will no longer support direct payment of tax credits for clean energy projects may signal additional threats to this title, given his concerns that these provisions may further exacerbate record inflation. The legislative calendar remains tight and filled with competing priorities, but a reconciliation deal may still be reached before the August recess.

Liam Donovan's Bottom Line

Towards the end of an otherwise quiet week in Majority Leader Chuck Schumer's ongoing talks with Senator Joe Manchin, word broke that Democrats have begun meeting with the chamber's Parliamentarian regarding a potential budget reconciliation package. Further reports indicate that Schumer's office has been working with the Congressional Budget Office, the official legislative scorekeeper, on the details of such a package. While these steps are not necessarily indicative of a breakthrough in negotiations, they do represent a tacit acknowledgement of the time crunch facing the party as we enter the summer.

Scoring is a precursor to the intensive procedural vetting necessary to advance any package through budget reconciliation without jeopardizing its privileged status. These steps take time, particularly in an iterative process that remains in flux, so having as many of these questions answered and components validated in advance is a wise move. CBO scoring issues repeatedly held up House consideration of the Build Back Better Act back in November, and preliminary meetings with the office of the Parliamentarian were put on hold back in December when the White House's initial talks with Manchin went south. Since then, the package has significantly narrowed in size and scope, making the ultimate "Byrd bath" less daunting, but it remains an obligatory part of the process.

At best, it marks a shift in phases from negotiation to execution. At worst, it reflects a calculated risk that having a package ready to go from a procedural standpoint is worth jumping the gun on a final deal.

Given the time crunch, it's apt to be both. With next week likely to be eaten up by gun safety legislation, and no sign of white smoke on a pre-recess framework, Congress stands to depart from Washington for its Independence Day recess with just three legislative weeks remaining before its annual summer break. With a practical goal, if not a necessity, of having any reconciliation deal wrapped up by August, getting ahead of the procedural curve is critical to keeping such a timeline in play. And with three scheduled September work weeks likely to be dominated by such legislative housekeeping as funding the government and meeting various other fiscal year authorization deadlines, the prospect of packing bicameral reconciliation action into the waning days of the FY22 budget resolution's remaining filibuster-eliding privilege amounts to a Hail Mary.

Practical inflection points for key decisions are approaching fast, and with just 25 overlapping legislative days remaining on the calendar, the technical deadlines are on the horizon. Substantively speaking, quiet is good--until it isn't. In the meantime, Democrats are doing what it takes to keep the process not only alive, but in position, whatever its ultimate configuration might be.

Calendar Crunch

- Window for action closing rapidly
 - 2.5 work periods remaining; 7 weeks/28 legislative days left with both chambers in town
 - After July 4th recess, just three weeks until August recess, practical deadline for most action
 - May be some pressure to stay in session, but Congress hates to cancel its breaks
 - September work period will be dominated by need for CR and any remaining loose ends
 - Midterm politics eclipse policy considerations by late summer
 - General election voting begins September 23 (SD/MN); 7 states by end of month
