State of Infrastructure and Reconciliation Negotiations

Little public progress has been made on the partisan reconciliation package this past week, but the legislation may start picking up steam in the coming weeks and months as Democratic leadership works to achieve compromise with holdout Senator Joe Manchin (D-WV). President Biden's newly released Fiscal Year 2023 budget request and the accompanying Treasury "Greenbook" signaled the administration's intention to fulfill Senator Manchin's desire for deficit reduction, while leaving a placeholder for prescription drug price reforms and clean energy tax incentives, the other core elements of any prospective deal. Notably, the proposal would also ensure American clean energy producers can continue to claim their full credits even after a prospective global corporate minimum tax comes online, though it does not provide further detail. The President's budget request and preliminary tax proposals will be altered significantly over the course of negotiations in Congress, but they could provide a framework to resolve some of the thorny conversations that will inevitably crop up when reconciliation debates come back in full force.

Liam Donovan's Bottom Line

This week's Beltway news was dominated by the release of President Biden's budget request, a perennial buffet of fiscal fantasy that nonetheless provides clues as to which policies the White House might pursue. Recall that last year's presidential budget provided a first draft of the Build Back Better agenda, then known as the American Jobs Plan and the American Families Plan, respectively, complete with policy explanations and revenue tables. With that in mind, the FY2023 edition might reasonably be expected to reflect the shifting political realities in the interim. But for all its messaging flourishes—and indeed, the administration billed this as its plan to lower costs, reduce the deficit, and curb inflation—the contents are merrily detached from anything that might conceivably become law.

Now, we should note that the President’s budget is fundamentally a political document—a vehicle for the administration to signal its priorities and rally its stakeholders irrespective of the odds of passage. At the same time, there is a certain dissonance between the headlines, which deem it a “peace offering” built around “Manchin priorities,” and the substantive reality of what the administration chose to include. And while there have been significant thematic adjustments since last year’s focus on transformative investment, the coverage has largely elided the White House decision to simply assume passage of the House Build Back Better tax title (minus SALT relief), incorporating its revenue provisions into the baseline in order to prop up rosy fiscal numbers.

The budget does include a “deficit neutral reserve fund” for legislation that “reduces cost, expands productive capacity, and reforms the tax system,” a placeholder for negotiations over a to-be-determined reconciliation package, should one materialize. And the thematic pivot toward moderate, Manchin- and midterm-friendly messaging is unmistakable. But given the opportunity to signal concessions as a means of moving his agenda forward, the President elected to double down, proposing more than $700 billion in additional tax increases, including a newsy non-starter in a “billionaire minimum income tax” (BMIT) that Manchin quickly shot down.

Much like the BBB baseline gimmick, these changes were incorporated in service of politically necessary deficit reduction goals, but it remains striking that they chose to recycle numerous provisions that Senator Kyrsten Sinema (corporate and individual rate hikes,) Manchin (repeal of fossil fuel preferences) and various others (repeal of stepped-up basis) have pointedly and publicly rejected. As the White House seeks to re-engage these members on a reconciliation package, building on the sense of narrative momentum that seemed to be materializing last week, these off-key elements stand to make a tense dynamic even more stilted. If nothing else, it raises questions as to whether the White House has learned the right lessons from a year of frustration and futility.

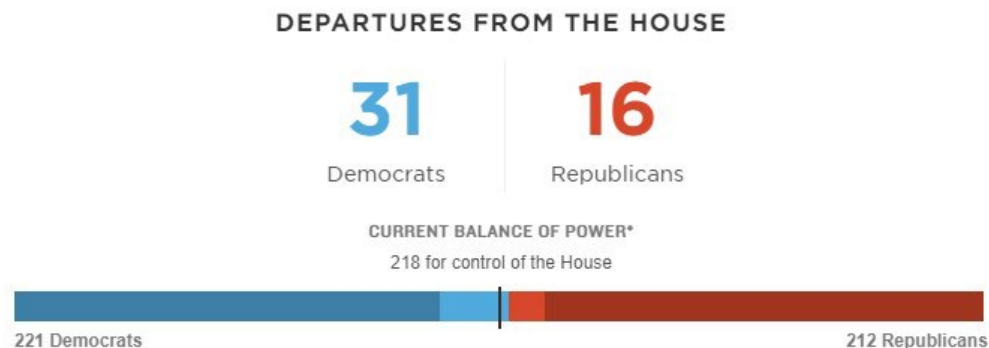

With Congress racing to wrap up its pending work heading into the Easter recess, we are unlikely to see any meaningful developments on reconciliation until the next work period, which stretches from late April through May. Memorial Day remains a crucial waypoint for tangible signs of a breakthrough. And with the White House and Democratic leaders increasingly spooked by grisly poll numbers, their focus remains on near term measures that can be seen to alleviate energy prices, like tapping the strategic petroleum reserve (SPR), or address ongoing supply chain issues, as with invoking the Defense Production Act (DPA) for critical minerals. The immediate imperative of appearing responsive to consumer—and ultimately, voter—angst compounds the timing challenge facing Democrats as the window for legislative action narrows. The next two months will determine whether they can keep the salvage effort on track.

PRG Pulse Election Analysis: What Retirements Mean for the Midterms

By: Dylan Pasiuk

With very little time left to legislate, President Biden’s dropping approval rating, and a slew of retirements, Democrats are increasingly worried about their prospects to hold onto both the House of Representatives and the Senate during the 2022 Midterm Elections. Throw in redistricting, where many traditionally safe Democratic seats are turning red, and many Democrats are seeing the writing on the wall and are choosing to either run for higher office or retire from politics entirely. This is most certainly the case for Reps. Tim Ryan (D-OH) and Conor Lamb (D-PA) who are competing to replace retiring GOP Senators Rob Portman (R-OH) and Pat Toomey (R-PA) after their House seats turned considerably redder due to the redistricting process.

What is also concerning for Democrats is that many Committee Chairs and members of party leadership, such as Rep. Peter DeFazio (D-OR) (Transportation and Infrastructure), Rep. John Yarmuth (D-KY) (Budget), and Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson (D-TX) (Science, Space, and Technology) have decided to retire, indicating that they feel they are likely to be plunged into the minority.

However, things aren't all bad for Democrats as the Senate map is much more favorable than the House. Also, there is only one Democrat retiring from the Senate, albeit the longest serving Senator and arguably one of the party's power brokers, in Senator Patrick Leahy (D-VT). Rep. Peter Welch (D-VT), another House retirement, is currently being tapped as his likely replacement.

Democrats need to hope that President Biden's approval rating, which is historically an indicator of Midterm results and the tide that will raise (or lower) all boats, turns around quickly. It is likely that many Democrats are banking on the passage of another reconciliation bill, something they can easily campaign on, to turn around their prospects and the President's approval. However, the closer we get to summer and the sprint of the campaign season, the harder it will be for Democrats to pass any meaningful legislation and the more likely that we will see a split 118th Congress.
